OUTLOOK IS BIG FOR ALPINEITES

Openings Plentiful for the Farmer, Fruit Grower and the Miner.

Alpine, Texas, May 14.—The section of the country surrounding Alpine, the county seat of Brewster county, is in the same situation as pertains to its agricultural and mineral development, as is, almost without exception, the case throughout the entire western and southwestern portion of Texas. The town itself is located near a spring which, in pioneer days, was used as a camping place for freighters who hauled overland supplies from India-ola, then the principal port on the Texas coast, to Chihuahua, Mexico. Of course the general appearance of the country is vastly different from what it was in the pioneer days, the town of Alpine now being a progressive little city of some 2,500 inhabitants, and the country adjacent being dotted with homes of ranchmen, and of settlers who are rapidly taking up and improving the more desirable public school lands now on the market. The last named class of settlers are termed, locally, "squatters," and the land so taken up by them a "squat."

Until now, however, practically all of the development is directly due to the "cowman" and the "sheepman," and it yet remains for the farmer and the miner to come into their own, thereby making of the fertile and productive valleys and mineral bearing mountains a means of providing for the many thousands of people of which it is capable.

Mineral Outlook Good. Several mines producing silver and quicksilver are already operated in Brewster county and pay large dividends on the amounts invested in them, but the mineral possibilities of this section have never been systematically or scientifically investigated and prospected, and when it is taken into consideration that this county is far greater in extent than several of the smaller states, and that indications of the existence of the more valuable minerals are known to exist throughout its entire extent, some idea of what awaits the prospector and mining man may be had.

Interspersed and scattered among the mountains which largely enter into the topography of the county, are to be found many valleys varying in extent from a few miles in length and a mile or two wide, to some of the area of which is equal to that of some of the smaller counties of the state. Alpine is located in one of the larger valleys at an altitude of 4,584 feet.

In most, if not all of these valleys, surface wells with a good flow of water can be had at a depth of from 100 to 200 feet, and the canyons opening out from the mountains into these fertile valleys could, by means of dams, be utilized as storage reservoirs with storage capacity sufficient to irrigate every tillable acre of land in the county. Two such dams are now under construction, and when completed will irrigate in the aggregate some 50,000 acres of land.

For the growing of apples and berries, and in fact all kinds of fruit which can be grown in a temperate climate, west Texas notably offers greater inducements than any other part of Texas. This industry is being developed in the immediate vicinity of Alpine, and is destined to become a large factor in the growth and development of the future section.

Modern School System. In addition to the advantages offered to the farmer, horticulturist and miner, the little city of Alpine may well boast of having one of the best equipped and most modern public school systems in the entire state, its high school building having been constructed at a cost of $40,000 and there being available a maintenance fund the sum of $12,000 annually.

Everything considered, its undeveloped natural resources, its public school system, adequate church buildings, ideal climate and picturesque location, Alpine may justly lay claim to the title of "The Roof Garden of Texas."
